“ The first time Greg and I met in Michigan, he was giving me directions to where he was. I got very lost, he asked me "what side the sun was on?" I was so confused, he started laughing and saying I was "dazed and confused and somewhere between lost and found." He always got a kick out of my blonde moments.

We also had a standing joke between us that if I didn't answer my phone when he called that he'd pick a new cousin to be his favorite! We both knew we were each other's favorite.

He loved to embarrass me in restaurants as well, once we ordered lunch and the waitress brought mashed potatoes instead of fries, he looked so serious and with a straight face said, "should we use pictures?" He acted so serious and when she walked away he bust out laughing and thought my face of shock was just as amusing as the waitresses.

Everytime he came up north, him and I would always have a conversation about why he wouldn't wear a coat. No matter how cold in Michigan it was he would not wear a coat and he'd be in short sleeves or a sweatshirt. He was stubborn and I'll miss that, he was always saying "devil hates a coward."

I am already so lost without our hours of conversations and laughter, he was so much more than a cousin, he was a best friend. This is not goodbye, just a so long for now. I will always miss and love him.
